Not illustrated. 1844 edition. Excerpt: ...Leonardo perceived, but doubted its discovery by his adversary. In reality the correct move was overlooked by the Prince, who lost the game. The Puttino then told him there had existed one sole means of drawing it, but that the move was so darkly difficult, it could only be explored by quite a first-rate player. Now our brave Paolo had seen this move, and thereupon remarked, that with the gracious permission of the Prince, he would undertake to draw the situation in question. This consent being willingly accorded, the position was replaced, Leonardo feeling assured of victory, not believing it possible the stranger could have found out this stroke of skill; but at the first move Paolo clearly convinced him that he had seen all. The Puttino then said aloud, Leonardo, methinks thy foe is correct, but let us watch whether the end correspond with the beginning. Well pleased was he of Syracuse thus to discover he was in the presence of his rival, and replied aloud, I were not II Siracusano, had I not perceived this thing, and glad am I to have discovered the move which draws the game thus, and thus, and with pleasure I inform the Signor Leonardo that I have come here from Sicily, generously moved by his just fame, to measure myself against him; and I beseech him to grant my request, with the license of the Prince, that it may be proved which of us is the best master of this most onerevole pasaa-tempo. II buon Leonardo accepted the challenge with delight, when he knew from what renowned player it came, and the match was at once entered upon; the Prince and his honourable lady taking conspicuous seats as spectators, and a crowd of players occupying the space around, moved thereunto by the great reputation of the combatants, and...
