

The Child and the Curriculum: Philosophy for Children

John Dewey's book, The Child and The Curriculum, looks at the process of education from both perspectives: child and curriculum. Dewey leads the reader to view the curriculum, what the child must learn, from the child's present state of mind. He also considers the teacher's point of view as the vehicle that imparts and delivers the curriculum. Dewey understood that the structure of a child's mind is far different from that of an adult. A child does not have a framework in which to classify and place all the information he is receiving. The child is still developing both the context and the framework to process information about the world around him. The child's interests lie in the world of persons and relationships as opposed to that of facts and laws. Dewey identified three factors in the fundamental divergence between the child and the curriculum. The child's experience is narrow and personal, but the world is vast extending both in space and time. He sees a unity, wholeheartedness, where the curriculum is specialized, and divided. The child's life is practical and focused on emotional bonds; the curriculum is an abstract principle of logical classification.
